A comparison of focal adhesion kinase and phosphorylated focal adhesion kinase as predictors of neoadjuvant chemotherapy in uveal melanoma patients. To compare the role of focal adhesion kinase (FAK) and its phosphorylated form (pFAK) as predictors of response to neoadjuvant chemotherapy in uveal melanoma patients. Retrospective study. Forty-eight consecutive patients with uveal melanoma received neoadjuvant chemotherapy as a neoadjuvant local treatment (Group A, 24 patients) or for metastatic disease (Group B, 24 patients). The sensitivity of FAK and pFAK to evaluate the response was calculated by the percentage of patients who had a decreased percentage of viable neoplastic cells following chemotherapy. FAK and pFAK expression was evaluated by immunohistochemistry before and after chemotherapy. pFAK demonstrated a higher sensitivity to evaluate the efficacy of chemotherapy in uveal melanoma patients than FAK. In Group A, for FAK, the sensitivity was 76% and for pFAK 89%; for Group B, for FAK, the sensitivity was 82% and for pFAK 93%. Furthermore, no correlation was found between survival and expression of either FAK or pFAK. FAK and pFAK may be two independent biomarkers of response to chemotherapy in uveal melanoma. Psychiatric disorders in primary care: towards an integrative systems perspective. Improving access to psychiatric and psychosocial care in primary care has long been regarded as a goal of patient-centered care. However, in the wider literature, this goal is more often championed by secondary-care providers who often assume knowledge of how to implement such a care model in primary care. The authors challenge this supposition and argue for the need for primary-care providers to conduct rigorous studies of the complex care models that they have experimented with and to learn more about integrated care models. The literature review highlights work from both the US and UK, both of which have implemented integrated care interventions for depression and psychosis in primary care and have collected data on patient, provider and structural characteristics. This literature suggests that integrated care models may work by decreasing access delays (if integrated with pharmacotherapy), increasing patient satisfaction, and improving health outcomes (particularly through reductions in inpatient hospitalizations). However, the relative weighting of these mechanisms is not yet clear. Implications for further research include the need for high-quality evaluations of integrated care models, with

(CNN) Police said a home in the Dallas area had more than 12,000 cloned Social Security cards in it, making it the largest cache of counterfeit documents that they've ever seen. They also announced Thursday the arrests of a landscaper in Dallas and a service provider in Garland, Texas. Dana Chad and his landscaping company both run by the name of Direct Lawn Services are both accused of illegally producing and passing off the phony Social Security cards. Dana Chad, 51, is accused of doing business under the name Direct Lawn Services and his company is listed as being based in Garland. Police said the fake ID cards being passed out are related to his landscaping business. "The business was not licensed or approved to sell Social Security cards, nor did it have a valid license or permit to do business in the State of Texas," police said in a news release. Read More has been proven. As computer technology develops and as our knowledge of its capability expands, more and more people will use a computer to process personal records. These examples include bank accounts, stock accounts, checking accounts, savings accounts, insurance policies, wills, and insurance claims, among many others. A careful study of the background information of this document shows the clear intention of the authors to require that personal records be processed by computer, as a requirement in the registration document. The federal government is being guided by a concern that the private sector will have a monopoly on data processing. When they are convinced that a monopoly exists, they will legislate to impose their monopoly on the market. This will make it harder to adapt computers to personal records and may make it more difficult to achieve the goal of storing personal data so it can be quickly retrieved.
